Abstract
What will the long-term impact of President Vladimir Putin's decision to invade Ukraine be upon the Russian state? This article assesses the likely outcomes of the Kremlin's war of aggression in Ukraine across a spectrum of economic, military, political, and social factors to evidence the scale of Russian miscalculation regarding its disastrous decision to invade Ukraine, and argues for the inevitability of Russian strategic decline as a direct consequence of its reckless military adventure.

Introduction
When, during the American Revolution, the British Army surrendered to General George Washington at Yorktown, Virginia, British General Charles Cornwallis reportedly ordered his men to march out of their garments while the pipes played the tune "The World Turned Upside Down" (Merrinsey, 1999). It was an apt and musical choice, given the circumstances that hardly could have been envisioned 7 years before, when the first shots were fired at Lexington and Concord in April 1775. Cornwallis was stunned that Washington's ragged army—ever on the verge of collapse—could defeat his well-trained professional force. This wasn't supposed to happen. Cornwallis had arrived in America some years earlier with a task to bring the independence-minded colonials back into the empire's fold. The wayward colonists
